Chronicling a struggle against all odds, this account follows the Central Australian Aboriginal Media Association's (CAAMA) decision to apply for a remote television satellite license. Success seemed a remote possibility, the book reveals, but winning the license would make Imparja the first Aboriginal-controlled commercial television station—in not just Australia but the world—with a transmission footprint larger than Western Europe. Detailing the CAAMA's battle, this is truly a story of heroes, densely populated with strong characters, both for and against Imparja's existence and its survival.
