Making Irish crochet lace is most fascinating, greatly because it allows sufficient freedom in the arrangement of designs to display the workers ingenuity. In ordinary crochet the work usually progresses in rows, one worked upon the other in carefully counted stitches. In Irish lace numerous sprays of flowers, leaves, etc., in more or less conventional style are worked over a cord foundation. These rather solid pieces of crochet are arranged according to fancy and firmly sewed upon a foundation pattern (to which we refer later). The spaces between the sprays are then filled in with lace-like bars of crochet and the whole is finished with the edgings characteristic of Irish crochet lace. In the sprays the cord padding is an important factor, for by its tightness or looseness, stems or leaves of various designs can be curved in any direction desired and give a life-like appearance to the flower, which the counted stitches alone can never give. The directions for a spray may be followed very carefully by two workers, and yet they may obtain quite different results. When a spray shows signs of getting either saucer shaped or frilled, when it should lie flat, the worker will have to use her own discretion, increasing or diminishing number of stitches in order to bring out the desired result. The aim of the worker should be, to produce the most artistic work she is capable of; if, by altering a curve or adding a leaf to any spray she can create a design more pleasing to herself, she should not hesitate to follow her own inclination. These instructions are intended for those who wish to become good workers, and to them it is necessary to explain the object in view. They must understand that two workers seldom work alike, and the same spray from these directions, by two different persons, might turn out to be of a different size. In order to teach each detail in
