How to rear a Child From Biblical days obedience is considered the essence of child rearing. This is the cause of our present day chaos. Obedience has become the basis of bringing up children, and that is the wrong basis. Instead of obedience intelligence, and rebelliousness should be the basis of growth. The child should say yes only when his intelligence says yes; otherwise he should be allowed to say no. And his yes or his no has to be respected. He is a guest from an unknown world, a visitor, a guest to your family. Never consider children your possessions and condition the child into something that destroys the inner talent. Each child is born as a new edition of consciousness into the world. He brings fresh fragrance and beauty into the world. Each child is intuitive and capable of attaining to its Buddhahood. Leave him alone uncorrupted of any influence. Free the child from the priest, parent and the politician so that he can be a human being not confined into narrow boundaries of religion, caste, and political affiliations. Therefore the only way to rear a child is to leave him alone free of the parents, priest and the politician. Each of these deters the child in exploring the inherent talent. Allow them to soar high in the sky like the birds instead being like turkeys. It needs courage and immense love in a father, in a mother, to tell the children, "You need to be free of us." Love your children, enjoy their freedom. Let them commit mistakes. Certainly help them to see where they have committed a mistake. Tell them, 'To commit mistakes is not wrong – commit as many mistakes as possible, because that is the only way you will be learning more. But do not repeat the same mistake again and again, because that makes you stupid.' This book 'How to Rear a Child?' by Taoshobuddha offers a totally new, unconventional yet very profound perspective based on his buddha nature and Enlightened Awakening which might sound a bit 'daring' for parents living at the material level, but would surely bring up heart-centered children who would certainly attain to new dimensions both in inner and external lives.
